In a private letter from one of America's Major-Generals in France to an officer of the American Library Association some interesting facts are given about the habits of the American soldier as displayed on his days "off," which ought to afford general satisfaction.

This officer says: "You know by now about their splendid behavior in the field, for even censored letters and newspaper correspondence could not hide it. They have been wonderful and to none more than to ourselves, trained in obedience. The 'folks' of these splendid soldiers were no doubt acquainted with their quality, but we officers never were aware We know it now; they are sol-f whom a commander must be proud, and they deserve to be called

"But it is of these boys when they rome out of the trenches that I want to write, for I guess I am proudest of them then. Cheerful and guy they are all the time, contented with the most innocent means of spending their reeting time. That, too, proves their worth.

Gabrielle is one of the most perverse women in dramatic literature. Hedds women in dramatic literature. Hedda Gabler's malevolence was a neurosis brought about by the suppression of instinct, but we are given no psycho-patholigical data to account for Gabrielle's hatefulness. The pleasure of malevolence is undoubtedly a fact of the human constitution, but only in natures specially prone to the state can gratification be derived from the infliction of suffering. Without the motive of revenge or of self-protection Gabrielle finds a sensuous stimulation in producing the writhings of stimulation in producing the writhings The craving to exercise power over the destines of others with the pleasure incidental to demonstrating superiority is not emphasized as in the case of Hedda, though a similar provocation in seeing others happy is indicated.
